

U.S. at Risk of Losing the Benefits of Talented International Students

America Needs International Students and Scholars

The United States is in a competition for global talent with other countries. In 2021, we experienced a fifth consecutive year of decline in new international student enrollment, exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic. We continue to lose our market share of international students and scholars (down 8% since 2001), while many other countries have proactively established national policies and marketing strategies in order to attract these talented individuals.

International students can work for up to 18 months after graduation.

Graduates of certain high-need occupations are able to work longer, for up to four years.¹

In 2019, Australia saw an increase of 10% in international student enrollment. In 2019, the government announced students who study and remain in certain regional areas will receive an additional year on their post-study work visa.²

Following graduation, foreign students can work for a time period equal to the period they studied in Canada, up to a maximum of three years.

Work experience considered "skilled" helps graduates qualify for legal residence in Canada.³

In 2019, international enrollment increased by 13%.

Foreign students graduating with a master's degree or above are immediately eligible to apply for work visas within one year of graduation.⁴

In 2008, China set a target of bringing half a million foreign students to its shores by 2020; in 2017, China is on track to meet this goal, hosting 492,000 students in 2019.

What the U.S. Government Can Do to Help Our Universities Compete

America needs a national recruitment strategy to proactively attract talented individuals

Congress should support bills that make us a mo

make us a more welcoming nation

We urge Congress to make more green cards available for students who graduate from our universities.

Congress should allow international student visa applicants to express interest in staying in the U.S. after graduation.

#WelcomeToSucceed 🎉